

Human Rights Day HRD 2025 Letter Text

Dear Prime Minister and Political Leaders,

This Human Rights Day comes at a significant moment. As civil society leaders, we write to mark seventy-five years since the European Convention on Human Rights, giving legal force to the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, and twenty-five years since our Human Rights Act brought these protections home into UK law.

These anniversaries remind us that human rights are not abstract ideals. They are the framework that protects people's dignity, limits the misuse of power, and helps to shape a fairer society. Across the UK, human rights have quietly and consistently made a difference in people's lives: ensuring dignity in care, fairness in housing, protection in education, accountability in public services, and justice when things go wrong.

Human rights protections need to be matched by strong political leadership and a clear commitment to put them into practice. The law provides the framework, but it is through the actions and choices of those in power that these protections become real in people's lives.

This year's Human Rights Day falls at a time when many people feel deep uncertainty about the future. These are serious and worrying times. It would be easy to look inward, to narrow our vision, or to allow hard-won protections to slip away through neglect or division. But we choose a different path.

We choose to look forward with determination and hope. The lesson of history is that human rights matter most when they are hardest to defend. In moments of uncertainty, they provide a shared foundation of fairness, dignity and accountability – the rules that keep our democracy decent and our society grounded in respect for each other's humanity.

This anniversary year is a chance to set out a bold and hopeful vision for human rights here at home. A vision of a UK that stands by its international commitments and strengthens, rather than weakens, the protections that have served our society for generations. A vision where human rights are part of everyday life – where people understand and can use their rights, and where public bodies have the knowledge and responsibility to uphold them. A vision of a democracy that plays by the rules, with government held to the same standards it expects of others.

We urge you, as political leaders, to:

- Publicly reaffirm the UK's commitment to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights, and the Human Rights Act.
- Reject any proposals that weaken these frameworks and commit to securing them now and for the future.
- Invest in making human rights real, ensuring that communities, public bodies and individuals have the knowledge, resources and confidence to uphold them in practice.
- Lead with clarity and courage, being clear that human rights are not a partisan issue but the shared foundation of our democracy.

Eighty years ago, the world chose to build a universal framework for human dignity. Seventy-five years ago, the UK helped shape it into a law for a continent ravaged by war. Twenty-five years ago, those protections became part of our lives at home.

As we near the end of 2025, at a time where fear, intolerance and division risks taking hold, we can choose to step forward together in support of universal human rights, confident in the values that have long defined us, and hopeful about the society we can build.

Yours sincerely,
